

Cessna 441 Conquest II

By Edward G. Tripp

Photography by Paul Bowen

Designed for performance and dubbed "Jetprop," the Conquest II overcame early troubles to star again in the nineties.

Cessna entered the turboprop market in 1977 with the CE-441, well after Beech and Rockwell Commander had established themselves in that market segment. Originally trademarked "Conquest," Cessna's AlliedSignal TPE331-8 powered airplane was renamed "Conquest II" in 1983. The 441 was designed for performance and actually outperformed some early Citations in selected parameters. Indeed, some companies offering aftermarket performance mods for today's Conquest fleet say an updated CE-441 can still run head-to-head with the Citation II.

The 441's cabin is large. It can accommodate 11 passenger seats in commuter configuration, and, more typically, six or seven seats in executive configuration. The airplane's long nose has two separate baggage bays, with the avionics rack in the forward bay and the batteries stowed under the rear bay floor. There also is a large baggage area in the aft cabin. The cabin has a large two-part airstair door, and a wide, three-part door option was available.

The cockpit is laid out in typical Cessna 400 series fashion, reflecting the lessons learned in developing the much-praised Citation cockpit. Pilot seats are comfortable and large and there is good visibility out of the cockpit windows.

Standard avionics, which included an RMI, transponder with encoder, weather radar and a flight control system, was (except for the radar) from Cessna's electronics subsidiary, Aircraft Radio Corp. (ARC). An optional Collins package, which many customers preferred, was available. However, the PCS 1000 flight director was the only FCS available until the very end of production. Ultimately some 15 airplanes went out the door with the Sperry (Honeywell) SPZ-500.

Many turboprops of the day were poor performers between 17,000 and 25,000 feet because of powerplant and environmental system limitations. But, the Conquest II can roll right up to and above FL 300 except in very high temperatures. Early 441's can reach FL 350 in about 25 minutes using a recommended cruise climb of 160 KIAS (150 above FL 250) in ISA standard day conditions after a take-off at a MTOW of 9,850 pounds.

Cruise speed tops out at 276 KTAS. Maximum effort, zero-wind, VFR range is just under 2,000 nm. (See the accompanying specifications.)

The performance of the Conquest extends beyond all-out speed or seats-empty range. It offers flexibility, comfortably handling the more typical (shorter) distances of most business trips and hauling a lot of payload, while still providing near-jet performance to handle longer legs.

Development

A total of 362 CE-441's were manufactured. According to Aviation Data Ser-
