

Chapter 9: Critical Criminology

What Is Critical Criminology?

School of thought with multiple subfields

Concerned with social justice and inequality

Favours larger scale societal transformations, rather than minor policy changes

Focuses on how social processes create criminals

Rooted in Marxist views

- o Marxism – argues that society must be understood in terms of social conflict, class relations, and the inequalities caused by capitalism

Originated during the social upheaval that took place in the 1960s-1970s

- o Civil rights
- o Women's liberation
- o The anti-war movement
- o Queer rights

Prominent Streams within Critical Criminology

NEO-MARXISM

Focuses on how the state uses the criminal justice system to legitimize unequal social arrangements through laws that cater to elite groups, while oppressing the working class

Involves the belief that crime is a result of social groups struggling to maintain or overthrow oppression

Categorized as conflict theory – theories that focus on the unequal distribution of power in society due to class, race, gender, etc.

Traditional Marxist perspective:

1. In a capitalist system, the economy dictates the structure and functioning of society (including crime)
2. Capitalism is directly to blame for crime because it creates the conditions of inequality that lead to crime
3. The only way to eliminate crime is to eliminate the conditions that create it (capitalism)

Neo-Marxist perspective:

- o Incorporates aspects of the interactionist perspective – a theoretical approach that focuses on relatively small-scale social interactions among individuals or small social groups, as well as the conscious acts of individuals and their interpretations of others' behaviour

The Creation of Criminalized Class

Reiman's "The Rich Get Richer and the Poor Get Prison"

Neo-Marxist perspective on the punitive turn

Argues that the US criminal justice system is not to fight crime, but to maintain existing class relations through the creation of a criminalized class among the poor

Those who might represent a potential challenge to political, social, and economic elites are neutralized behind bars

The state focuses on creating and policing crimes that are typically associated with poverty

FEMINIST CRIMINOLOGY

Addresses patriarchal issues such as:

- o Androcentrism – treating men and women the same despite their very different socialization, social problems, and social statuses
